In the distant past, the beginnings of the world and of society were explained in mythology. Mythology is the rich 16 of tales from different cultures about how the world was 17 and why certain things happen. Today the word "myth" is often used to describe something that is made up. Myths tell of gods or other supreme beings, heroes and events that are—or were 18—believed to be true.

Thousands of years ago, humankind did not have the sciences to help them 19 life. They did not know why the sun rises each morning, why the moon changes 20 or why the seasons change. Ancient peoples witnessed sickness, death and natural disasters but they did not know 21 caused them. To explain the world around them, groups of people 22 their own accounts about nature and life. These stories were usually not recorded. Instead, they were part of a(n) 23 tradition, meaning they developed slowly and were 24 from one generation to another through telling stories. Upon hearing the 25, people accepted them as the truth. 26, myths became beliefs. It is for this reason 27 mythology is closely associated with religion.

Mythmaking, 28 superstition, is not the sole property of people who lived thousands of years ago. It has traditionally looked to the past to try to make sense 29 the present. Some modern myths look to the future. Storytellers make use of the 30 inventions of the last few centuries to give vivid depictions of what Earth may be like hundreds of years from now. They imagine life on worlds billions of light-years away in space or far in the future.

Passage 1

“One way ticket? You are going to move into town?” the young man asked. He could not get his eyes off the pretty girl sitting in front of him in the train.

“No,” the girl said. She knew the young man had a crush on her. Women just know these things. They had been sitting in the train for hours, face to face. At first they had just nodded to each other, and then the young man had introduced himself politely. Obviously, she was not the kind who wanted to talk to strangers.

“You haven’t decided yet when you will return?” the youth did not want to leave the matter be.

“I won’t,” she said. “My sister invited me to America and I am leaving tomorrow morning,” she continued.

“Oh...” The young man had not expected this. Of course the times were rough and many people were traveling to seaports to take the ships to a hopefully better future across the ocean.

“I have heard it is not always very safe to go,” he tried.

“I shall meet others at the harbor,” the girl said with a voice that clearly said the conversation was over. “I shall be perfectly safe!”

At that the young man fell quiet. The girl closed her eyes and pretended to be napping. He had good time to watch her pretty, slightly round face, shiny brown hair. You could see from her clothes she was not wealthy, but everything was neat and clean. He realized he liked her very much, very, very much.

The girl opened her eyes and found him looking at her. He coughed, embarrassed he had been caught.

“I need to... go...” she said modestly. “Could you please keep an eye on my bags?”

“Of course, Miss,” he said.

When she came back she found him asleep. She shook her head and sat down. Her wooden box was under the seat and her smaller bag was... Nowhere to be seen!

He opened his eyes at her panic exclamation.

“My bag! Someone has stolen my bag!”

The young man looked scared. He got to his feet and ran out of the compartment. The girl frantically looked around to see if she had just put her bag into a wrong place. But it was nowhere to be seen.

“Is it this one?” the young man held a bag in his hands. “I found it in the corner of the next compartment.”

“Yes, yes it is!” she grabbed it quickly and opened it, “My purse... yes, it is here... My papers...” She sat down, looking like she was going to faint. “My passport! Someone has stolen my passport!”

“Oh no,” the young man said. “I shall go and ask everyone if they saw anything.”

He came back after half an hour. The girl looked at him hopefully. He shook his head. “Nothing. No one has seen anything, and none of the people look suspicious. Ordinary, decent folks, all of them.”

“My passport... Now I cannot leave!” she burst into tears. “Who would only take my passport and leave my purse and all the money? This makes no sense!”

He sat next to her and took her hand to console her. “Please, Miss. You can get another passport.”

“But it takes forever! I cannot get to this ship! My sister is waiting for me to arrive with it!”

“Write a letter explaining you will come later. Give the letter to someone who is going to that ship and can take it to your sister in America.”

Slowly she calmed down.

“I shall help you to get a new passport, because it was my fault it was stolen,” the young man said. “The first thing we shall do is to go to the police to report the theft. At least they can check if anyone is trying to use it.”

He felt her passport in his inside breast pocket. He would need to get rid of it as soon as possible.

She did not say anything but gave him a faint smile. He looked into her grey blue eyes and smiled so tenderly that she blushed.

Passage 2

Online education is still a hot topic among employers for a number of reasons. Many employers welcome online educational qualifications because they recognize the fact that the individuals who are trained online have vital qualities that other competitors may not have and that they are also trained to the same level as anyone completing a campus course. However, there are still some traditional employers who will still question the fact that the individuals did not sit in a classroom for three or four years. For some reason, those employers do not perceive an online degree as of value.

However, these employers are few now simply because the online degree graduates are filling jobs that may never have otherwise been filled. They are responding to the demand and helping the country to run much more smoothly than it has done in a long time. In fact, online college degrees and technical qualifications have revolutionized the way that the world of education and the world of industry work. Although attitudes are changing, nobody with an online degree should expect not to be challenged when it is presented in a resume or in a job interview because it is still likely to be a topic of discussion.

Attending a campus institution makes the degree easily identifiable and easy to track in terms of what the candidate has indeed completed. Online degrees are not as easy to trace and can prove to be quite difficult to substantiate too. However, they both tend to have the same amount of work involved with the latter providing far more useful personal qualities in terms of working off one's own initiative and time management skills. While that is not to discredit campus graduates, these are qualities that can be pointed out in an interview to help a candidate's claim to a job!

An employer is well within his or her right to check up on an educational background and may indeed be cautious of individuals with online qualifications from universities and colleges that are less well-known because of the number of faking agencies out there. An employer will be skeptical until everything actually checks out. It may even put them off hiring you. This is just because of the healthy suspicion that still lingers over the online degree, and with good reason. However, the larger online universities are well-known enough by now to need no explanation. The one question a potential employer will always ask though is why the candidate chose to take an online degree instead of a campus course. This is a question that you always need to be prepared for and have a good answer ready.

No matter how well you try to prepare for an interview, you can never count on which way an employer will go or what view of an online degree he or she will take, so you need to have answers prepared for every possibility. Trying to predict the reaction will often land you in more trouble than assuming the worst. Always assuming the worst is the best advice that you could take because you are then prepared for anything. If you are confident and put faith in your degree, providing evidence to substantiate the fact that it is real, it should no longer hold you back!

46. Which of the following is true of employers' attitude toward online degrees?
- A. Many employers question the value of online degrees.
 - B. Many employers refuse to recognize online degrees.
 - C. Many employers care little about online degrees.
 - D. Many employers acknowledge online degrees.
47. What might be an advantage for online degree graduates according to the passage?
- A. They are better qualified for traditional jobs.
 - B. They may possess better personal qualities.
 - C. It is more cost-effective to hire them to work.
 - D. Online education is something new in the modern world.
48. Why are some employers skeptical of online degree holders?
- A. They are filling jobs too quickly.
 - B. Their qualifications are questionable.
 - C. Their qualifications are less competitive.
 - D. They have received less technical training.
49. Which of the following is frequently asked about in a job interview for online degree holders?
- A. The reason for choosing online programs.
 - B. The reputation of the online university.
 - C. The certificate of an online degree.
 - D. The courses of online education.
50. Which of the following might be the best title for the passage?
- A. Advantages of Online Degrees
